Sharing an Office at Home
Dec 18, 2017 - Dec 24, 2017

As the number of self-employed people grows and the "sharing economy" expands, more people are renting out space in their homes as places for others to work.

LONDON, England (Achieve3000, August 30, 2017). Claire Brynteson had a house, a job, and a dining room table that was empty after her kids left for school in the morning. Then one day, she received a flyer recommending that she rent seats in her home to people looking for short-term office space, and she jumped at the chance to make some money by sharing workspace.

This woman is working in a space she rented in a private home through the Spacehop website in London.

Workspace sharing is the latest trend in the so-called sharing economy, where those looking for extra cash are generating income in savvy ways. Indeed, with soaring office costs and an increased number of self-employed people, the demand for shared office space in metropolitan areas is rising. That's what prompted Internet companies like Spacehop (a website where Brynteson lists her home office space) to rent workspace by the hour. Vrumi, a similar company that was founded in 2015, says it has 5,000 registered users, and Breather, which first launched in Canada in 2013, now also operates in the U.S. and England.

As you read, watch for details about space sharing. What is it, and how does it benefit the homeowner? How does it benefit the renter? Do you think space sharing will continue to grow? Take notes, including facts and details, here. You can use these notes later, when you respond to the Thought Question.

The sharing model is similar to Airbnb, which was founded in 2008. With Airbnb, people can rent out all or part of their homes by the night. The hosts may or may not be home at the time.
